El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras consist among the most violent countries in the world. High levels of insecurity, systemic corruption, and widespread impunity have undermined the capacity of governments in this region to develop the strong and accountable institutions needed to meet these challenges effectively.

This year’s report shows a region which has faced an alarming number of people fleeing violence and insecurity in their home countries. As the number of people leaving the region grows, it presents new challenges for any government or organization working to address these challenges in the region. The Central America Monitor in this report reviews international assistance programs in the region and highlights the policies and strategies currently being implemented in Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua to reduce the number of people fleeing violence in the region. These efforts have been focused on reducing levels of insecurity, and improving public trust.

The arrival of large numbers of immigrants and refugees has forced an alarming number of people to either become internally displaced or migrate to other countries in search of a better life. The situation in the region is often characterized by economic opportunity, the effects of climate change, and the fragile government institutions unable to protect their citizens.

The extensive data compiled by the Monitor allow us to analyze the key challenges faced by: Central American government officials, as well as civil society organizations working to address these challenges. As the number of people leaving the region grows, it presents new challenges for any government or organization working to address these challenges in the region. The Central America Monitor in this report reviews international assistance programs in the region and highlights the policies and strategies currently being implemented in Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua to reduce the number of people fleeing violence in the region. These efforts have been focused on reducing levels of insecurity, and improving public trust.

The arrival of large numbers of immigrants and refugees has forced an alarming number of people to either become internally displaced or migrate to other countries in search of a better life. The situation in the region is often characterized by economic opportunity, the effects of climate change, and the fragile government institutions unable to protect their citizens.

The extensive data compiled by the Monitor allow us to analyze the key challenges faced by: Central American government officials, as well as civil society organizations working to address these challenges. As the number of people leaving the region grows, it presents new challenges for any government or organization working to address these challenges in the region. The Central America Monitor in this report reviews international assistance programs in the region and highlights the policies and strategies currently being implemented in Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua to reduce the number of people fleeing violence in the region. These efforts have been focused on reducing levels of insecurity, and improving public trust.

The arrival of large numbers of immigrants and refugees has forced an alarming number of people to either become internally displaced or migrate to other countries in search of a better life. The situation in the region is often characterized by economic opportunity, the effects of climate change, and the fragile government institutions unable to protect their citizens.

The extensive data compiled by the Monitor allow us to analyze the key challenges faced by: Central American government officials, as well as civil society organizations working to address these challenges. As the number of people leaving the region grows, it presents new challenges for any government or organization working to address these challenges in the region. The Central America Monitor in this report reviews international assistance programs in the region and highlights the policies and strategies currently being implemented in Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua to reduce the number of people fleeing violence in the region. These efforts have been focused on reducing levels of insecurity, and improving public trust.

The arrival of large numbers of immigrants and refugees has forced an alarming number of people to either become internally displaced or migrate to other countries in search of a better life. The situation in the region is often characterized by economic opportunity, the effects of climate change, and the fragile government institutions unable to protect their citizens.

The extensive data compiled by the Monitor allow us to analyze the key challenges faced by: Central American government officials, as well as civil society organizations working to address these challenges. As the number of people leaving the region grows, it presents new challenges for any government or organization working to address these challenges in the region. The Central America Monitor in this report reviews international assistance programs in the region and highlights the policies and strategies currently being implemented in Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua to reduce the number of people fleeing violence in the region. These efforts have been focused on reducing levels of insecurity, and improving public trust.
WOLA is a leading research and advocacy organization advancing human rights in the Americas. We envision a future where public policies protect human rights and recognize human dignity, and where justice overcomes violence.